CHAPTER XXI.

The night of Harwood's party the mysterious woman friend of Ann's met Harwood in the conservatory. The rest of the guests were dancing and having a good time, but to this woman it had ceased to be fun. She longed to get out of it all, back to her home in the country, where she could forget, if possible, her life with Harwood, and start over.

As she sat meditating and realizing that her only source of living was the money that Harwood gave her, he passed through on his way to join the others. She called to him, "Won't you sit down a moment,"

Jack? I've something important I want to ask you."

It was evident Harwood had been drinking, and with an angry glance. "Well, what is it." he threw him self in a chair near her.

'I just wanted to ask you." She continued, "if you won't let me have enough money so I can go back home and out of your life forever," and she held out pleading hands toward him.

Harwood looked at her for a moment with a sneer and said: "It suits me very well in your being near at bound where I can have you arrange enough money so I can go back home and out of your life forever." and she held out pleading hands toward him.

Harwood looked at her for a moment with a sneer and said: "It suits me very well in your being near at boyou any more and I am sure I would be happier if I could go back home to the country. The continued of your being near at boyou won't let me have enough money so I can go back home and out of your life forever." and she held out pleading hands toward him.

Harwood looked at her for a moment with a sneer and said: "It suits me very well in your being near at boyou any more and I am sure I would not allow her to go about the way they do if it weren't for you won't let me have enough me very well in your being the continued where I can have you are near the the things I want. Ann's family would not allow her to go about the way they do if it weren't out the hands toward him.

Harwood looked at her for a moment with a sneer and said: "It suits the the hands towar
